I talked with Chris about this. I think because heads are starting to roll as a result of this that it's now rises to the level of a story.

There are three key things we need to have answered and explain if you interview him or Miday about this:

First, he needs to be transparent about himself not getting the position that Deskins had. I wouldn't attack him with this so much as I would say, "Hey, weren't you supposed to have that job under McGinty?" I don't think attacking is your style, but I think having a sort of buddy-buddy approach to broaching this subject is warranted.

Second, you need to get them to outlive VERY specifically what's wrong with the juvenile prosecution wing. We can't just have him say "there's problems." Tell them you want some hard evidence and not just a bunch of anecdotal crap. If they had philosophical difference over how that should be run, we can say that, but they need to actually show us examples. Otherwise, we're just giving him a pass over something that might be politically-motivated firings.

Third, we should reach out to the attorneys who got canned. They might be more honest about this than anybody.
